Congratulations

Flandreau author Rachel Eastman has several plots to future books going through her thoughts at any one time. Sometimes it's hard to even sit in her high school classes without thinking of stories.

The sophomore has been rewarded for her skill of writing by winning a silver medal nationally for the Scholastic Arts and Writing Awards for her fiction novel, "The Daniel Project."

She first was recognized at the state level with a Gold Key in February before advancing to the national competition among teens in grades 7-12 in 29 categories of writing. Works are judged on originality, technical skill and the use of voice or vision.

Her freshman English teacher Jamie Fryslie encouraged her to enter the competition.

"We didn't do a lot of creative writing, but her essays and journals were very well written, and she had shared with me that she enjoyed writing creatively," Fryslie said.

Besides encouragement, the only help Fryslie offered was some editing advice.

"Rachel is a unique student. She's someone that seems fairly confident to be her own person, which is a difficult thing to be when you're 16. She has a unique writing voice that really seems to capture teenagers in this day and age. She is also unique in her willingness to take action and do the extra work it takes to write a novel and submit it on her own."

Eastman's book, "The Daniel Project" is a story that takes place through the letters left behind by a boy named Daniel Harrison who died by suicide. His best friend, Caelyn Powell, reads the letters to find out the reason for his death. While the story isn't true, it is based on a friend that Eastman has that she wrote letters to, sharing emotions and thoughts.

Eastman wrote the 131-page book a year ago. Someday, she would like to get it published. "I might rewrite it in the future to fix it up," she said.

She has enjoyed writing since she was about 8 years old. "I just like how I can write about my experiences. I like making up scenarios with myself, too. It just helps get out emotions and feelings," she said.

Eastman writes every day, sometimes for hours and often journaling the ideas she has for about 15 books. "I have tons of drafts."

Eastman, who also plays flute in band and is a member of First Nation's Club in school, said writing is the one thing she excels at. "Not many people know it's one of the best things I can do. I'm not good at a lot of stuff. I might like writing, but I'm terrible at poetry," she said.

In addition to writing, she loves reading, mostly biographies, autobiographies and memoirs. She's an honor roll student who also is doing college readiness work through a program at South Dakota State University.

Someday, she hopes to go to New York University because it has a good writing program. Her second choice is the University of Nebraska, Omaha.

She is the Granddaughter of the late Francis Wakeman Jr & Grandmother Marilyn Wakeman

The Daniel Project
Chapter One:
"Do you know why you're here?" The girl shifted in her seat. She was anxious at the thought of being in the principal's office—and there she was in the seat of the principal's office. She had never been in there before, she didn't know what was needed of her. Sitting was an obvious option, but she was making a fool of herself just being in her seat. She kept fidgeting in her seat, there wasn't a moment where she sat still. There was so much to take in just a couple moments. She didn't know what to focus on since the principal wasn't looking at her.

A photo of the principal and his wife were on the desk in front of the girl. The photograph was innocent, wedding photograph of a newly wedded bride and groom. It frightened her. Anything in a room not familiar to her was intimidating. Even the small succulent plant on the edge of the desk terrified her. She had no words to say. She couldn't think straight. She couldn't think correctly. The room felt suffocating. The room was getting smaller and smaller by the second.

EXCERPT FROM THE DANIEL PROJECT

Chase Iron Eyes, the public relations liaison for Bear runner, told the Post that the laws pose a direct threat to member's of the Oglala Sioux Tribe, many of whom plan to oppose the pipeline project, which would run through and could threaten , scared tribal lands." we have a right to speak freely," Iron Eyes said. "We have a right to peaceably assemble." Triba leaders have said Noem and state legislators excluded them from the bill crafting process and instead elected to meet with TransCanada, the company behind the $8billion project, Iron Eyes said the effort amounted to a violation of the tribe's sovereignty and treaty it signed with the United States.

"we don't feel Kristi Noem wrote the legislation for the good of South Dakotans, or our land, or our water," he said. "we believe big extraction wrote this legislation."

The tribe's response on Wednesday was an unprecedented step, said Iron Eyes, who couldn't recall another instance when leaders told a representative of state government that she wasn't welcome on their land. If Noem violated the resolution, she could face banishment, a serious formal tribal process, through Iron Eyes said he doesn't think it'll come to that.

Noem's press secretary, Kristin Wileman, said in a statement that the governor " has spent considerable time in Pine Ridge building relationships with tribal members".

"This announcement from Oglala Sioux Tribal leadership is inconsistent with the interactions she has had with members of the community," Wileman said.

Noem visited the reservation in March, as residents were recovering from severe flooding in the region, a trip leaders welcomed at the time.

However, Iron Eyes said, she made subsequent trips to the reservation without informing Bear Running or other leaders, which he said was a lapse in diplomatic courtesy.

It's unfortunate that the Oglala Sioux's leadership when resources were needed during recent storms, but communication has been cut off when sha has tried to directly interact with members of Pine Ridge community, "Wileman said. The letter is another sign of further fraying relationships bwtween state government and it's neighboring tribes in the weeks since Noem proposed the protest bills. In Mid-March, four tribal chairman, including Bear Running asked the state not to display their flags at the capitol saying that the bills had "destroyed our trust" in South Dakota leadership. But Iron Eyes said he's confident the law's will be struck down eventually.

"We'er on the right side, here, of spirit and morality, " he said. "And the legality just needs to come along. "We've got tp evolve". From the oval office, however, president Trump has tried to muscle the pipeline project through its court challenges. Days after Noem signed her bills into law, Trump signed an executive order in an attempt to clear a path for pipeline construction. That, too, now faces legal challenges.

Gov. Noem responds to Oglala Sioux Tribal Council ban

By Delainey LaHood

Pierre, SD – Newscenter1 – May 2, 2019 – Gov. Noem's office has responded to a decision by the Oglala Sioux Tribal Council to ban her from the Pine Ridge Reservation.

The council voted to pass the official action unanimously on Wednesday in response to Gov. Noem's pipeline bills. Noem introduced the bills shortly before the end of the 2019 legislative session.

They're designed to spread the costs associated with potential Keystone XL oil pipeline protests by seeking money from pipeline developers and riot boosters — those deemed to be participating in or funding destructive protests.

On Thursday Gov. Noem's office told NewsCenter1 in a statement:

"The governor has spent considerable time in Pine Ridge building relationships with tribal members, visiting businesses, discussing economic development, and working with leadership. This announcement from Oglala Sioux tribal leadership is inconsistent with the interactions she has had with members of the community.

It's unfortunate that the governor was welcomed by Oglala Sioux's leadership when resources were needed during the storms, but communication has been cut off when she has tried to directly interact with members of the Pine Ridge community.

The governor will continue working to engage with tribal members, stay in contact with tribal leadership, and maintain her efforts to build relationships with the tribes."

The Oglala Sioux Tribal Council says it feels the bills unfairly target Native Americans and allies who support their efforts to keep oil pipelines away from tribal lands. They've also expressed concern that the new laws limit First and Fourteenth Amendment rights by chilling protected speech.

The ACLU filed a lawsuit in late March after the bills were signed into law. The suit specifically challenges one of the bills, S.B. 189, which is directed at "riot boosters." It argues that the language used by the new laws is too vague and invites arbitrary enforcement that "will result in indiscriminate targeting of peaceful organizers."

Noem says that the laws are designed to prevent local governments from being bankrupt by the pipeline's construction through South Dakota, and to hold different parties accountable for their actions — whether that be violent objectors, pipeline developers or beneficiaries of economic development.

She also says the bills were designed "to target out-of-state rioters funded by out-of-state interests that have attacked nearby projects."

In contrast, Cheyenne River Sioux Tribe Chairman Harold Frazier wrote in a statement released in March that Gov. Noem is "putting the economic needs of the foreign company TransCanada ahead of the future of South Dakota."
